Letter #1 : Dear friend in the future

God I hope you exist. However, based on my math, I think you do. I hope this letter finds you well because you are about to be my friend and i think its for the best that you are well. I don't think i'm rich so if you are unwell, let's hope it's the situation and stress cause I sure can't pay your hospital bills. Just a few disclaimers I wanted to give you so that you know what it is to be friends with me and know what's coming.

Okay, Hello my name is whydoyouthinkwillilyoumynameimnotthatstupid and I am laughing at your jokes because I don't get those references. I don't care how iconic the meme was or how famous the show was, so if you're trying to find a common ground for our friendship, get ready to fly because there is no ground. There are also no walls because of my inability to understand when I need to draw a boundary and tell a friend "NO". So I think the best that can come out of this is that I can avoid Donald Trump approaching me for friendship. Which is a relief cause I just said no to Elon.

Which brings me to another disclaimer, I am delusional. It broke my heart when I found out that friends and people around you can't telepathically communicate. Due to the lack of developments in science relating to telepathy, I lack communication skills as well. In my defence, I came into realisation in 12th standard, before that I was living in my dream world so before judging me, please know that I'm healing from the trauma of the real world and the fact that my friends are (and hopefully will be) real and not imaginary.

There will be a time when you feel like I am distancing myself from you and let me clarify. Yes, I am. It's not you, it's me. So, to save you from a person like me, I will distance myself from you. Because even though I am dumb, you chose to be my friend which makes you dumber. Therefore, as a slightly less dumb friend of yours, it is my duty to protect you.

Finally, the last disclaimer is not to be disheartened when I don't get your name right. I never will.

As you can see, I'm a very low maintenance friend who definitely could benefit from therapy.. I would love to be your friend and as mentioned above, I'm sure you have noticed that I'm a delight. I would surely appreciate if you could write back with your pointers as well so that I know what's coming

Love,
whydoyouthinkwillilyoumynameimnotthatstupid

Letter #2 : Dear friends at Qutub Minar,

When you go to a monument, do you stare at the architecture? Or the people staring at the architecture?Or more like stare at people pretending to stare at the architecture while there's another person behind them with a sleek rectangle capturing the photo of the person who's pretending to stare at the architecture? I'm all. Yes, I OBVIOUSLY look at the monument. But what's interesting is how the people who created it centuries ago wanted their monument to witness the future years, see how humans looked in future, how they love in future, and how they perceive the architecture in future. They never would have imagined that their art would one day have to watch a man in tight jeans and dark sunglasses walking away from Qutub Minar in slow motion to the background of "Jhoome Jo pathan". I find it incredibly fascinating how humans have become so self obsessed. I hate them and I don't think I fall into the human category. I sat in front of Qutub Minar and just observed the nature around me, I guess that just makes me God. And I'm not complaining, I am, though in all ways, perfect.

Continuing with the earlier thought, looking at every stone at Qutub Minar made me wonder, that it was created by humans who had their own lives. I think one of the workers- let's call him Mr Qutub, wanted to be a king in his childhood. But because it's a field where only nepo babies thrive, he was forced into this field of construction. Then, he got married. Aspiring to get a raise, his hopes vanished when Aibak died and the construction halted. Poor guy, hearing about another site, he started working towards the construction of hauz khas fort (I don't care about the timeline) but was killed by his son, who wanted to be a king and had heard stories of sons killing their fathers to get ahead in the race. Sad he killed the wrong father.

This is what I think about at the monuments and this is what I was thinking when I went to Qutub Minar. It's fascinating how some friends had guides in suits telling the histories while some were just dancing in front of the minar. But at the end of the day, Mr Qutub who made the Minar died, Mr Aibak died, Mr Iltutmish died, and friends who saw the monument 50 years ago died. You will also die. I, though God, might also die. The only thing that remains is Qutub Minar, until that too is demolished in some petty human conflict. So i guess friends the main question should be- "What's the fucking point?"

Love,
God.

Letter #3 : Dear friend who is incapable of expressing her feelings

How are you doing? It seems to be only this morning when I looked at you, I couldn't find you until I realized that maybe I lost you. Mornings are reserved for grieving. By night time, I can't help but be annoyed at you. Annoyed at how you promised to be different for good, annoyed at how easily you mask your internal urge to scream and smash your head against the wall and most importantly, I'm annoyed at how good you are at being calm from the outside so that others call you mature, even though you hate it. Anyway, I should be knowing how you are doing but unfortunately I don't. Perhaps because you are the person who I didn't keep in touch with the most. I miss your smile. I remember how every teacher in school used to call you "the smiling girl". Now people still compliment your smile but without the awareness of the amount of effort that goes behind it. But then again, when I see my other friends I see them casually mention things that you and I struggle with and realise that for others it is a joke, the difference lies in perception I guess. We became so engrossed in ourselves that we ironically, forgot each other's importance. Now in trying to make my friends feel important, I have kind of forgotten to look after you, and that's on me.

I would give up my future to go back to the past because there is you in the past and only me in the future. But maybe we can meet again? Obviously time travel is impossible but maybe I can try to be who I was before so that I could meet you again. So this time when I look in the mirror, I see the little chirpy, overdramatic girl I lost and when I go to sleep, I don't feel annoyed and defeated. I know I didn't really lose you. You're just a bit lost and you have to find your way back to me. Or maybe it is me who has to find her way back to you.

Love,
Your friend who's incapable of expressing her feelings.

Pluto is better than Earth, there are no people

Please write back 23:50PM

Read at your own risk!!

Merde

I think you hate me

Take the sadness out of a Saturday night

you're my friend, am I yours

Love, God are you there?

Letters to my friends

somehow summer makes me colder

I love you, leave me alone

je voudrais une vie

Are you real? Can I punch you?
